In a good sales year in the US, there is a warm sunny spring, a hot and dry summer, a cool autumn and a cold winter. Companies usually plan their sales at least a year in advance, so if the weather doesn't fit the usual pattern, there will be problems with the supply of particular products.

When the spring is colder than usual in the northern hemisphere, then sales of garden furniture, summer clothes and building materials decline. People simply wait until the weather gets warmer. In a hot summer, sales of ice cream, beer, bottled water and sun cream increase. In a cooler summer sales of these things and of products like fans and swimming pool supplies decrease.

It's a similar picture in the colder months of the year. If the autumn is warmer than usual, people wait to buy warm winter clothing like wool jumpers, warm coats, gloves and hats. But as soon as colder weather starts, people rush to buy these items. Other typical items sold in winter are hot-water bottles, medicines against cold and flu, car batteries and heating appliances. In colder weather demand for products for the home also grows because people start 'nesting' and preparing to spend more time indoors. Sales of comfort food like cakes and doughnuts are dependent on the weather and tend to rise when the temperature falls.

36. According to the passage, if there is unexpected weather conditions, _____.

- B) weather changes and the sales of products are closely correlated*
- C) weather changes affect sales much more in winter than summer
